

Nature vs. Nurture

Biologists believe that environmental influences modify genetic inheritance. They also believe that many behaviors are determined by a combination of inheritance and environmental influences. In fact, a combination of both is often the most accurate description of human behavior. Some have called this combination of influences the "interactionist" model of human behavior.

Biologists believe that both genes and environment cause people who they are. Genetic inheritance provides the blueprint for a person's physical traits and abilities, but without environmental input, inheritance is incomplete. Behavior does not develop and learn through inheritance alone. Environmental influences, such as those from parents and family, friends, and the culture in which a person grows up, also play a role in the development of a person's behavior. The interactionist model of human behavior suggests that a person's behavior is the result of both genetic and environmental influences.

In contrast to the "interactionist" model, some biologists believe that genes determine a person's behavior. This view is called the "genetic determinist" model of human behavior. It suggests that a person's behavior is determined by their genes and that environmental influences are not as important as they are often thought to be. This view is often called the "nature" side of the debate. However, most scientists believe that the "nurture" side of the debate is more important than the "nature" side.

Biologists believe that genes and environment both play a role in the development of human behavior. This view is called the "interactionist" model of human behavior. It suggests that a person's behavior is the result of both genetic and environmental influences. The interactionist model of human behavior suggests that a person's behavior is the result of both genetic and environmental influences.

Conclusion:

Genes and environment both play a role in the development of human behavior.
