Electronic Research Administration Simon Richard Kerridge, 2011 Research Management and Administration RMA is a developing profession Many RMA staff work in Universities and other Research Organisations but they can also be found in agencies that fund research in fact anywhere where research is undertaken or managed RMA can be defined as the leadership management or support of research activities and one area of endeavour that RMAs are involved with is Electronic Research Administration ERA IT systems designed specifically to support research management or administration The aim of my professional doctorate is two fold to show my contribution to the development of RMA as a profession in the UK and to demonstrate my practical contribution to advancing ERA systems including undertaking research to address the question is it perceived by RMAs and academic staff that ERA can affect the quality and quantity of research Over the years 1997-2011 I have been involved in and led many initiatives that have helped to shape RMA such that it is now recognised as a profession in the UK I chart my role in the development of RMA in the UK through the growth of the professional Association for Research Managers and

Administrators ARMA and other related initiatives The second strand of this doctoral work reflects on the specific ERA developments that I have introduced at the University of Sunderland collectively known as GRS On line In particular it highlights how and why the various Sunderland GRS systems were initiated developed enhanced and sometimes superseded Two elements of GRS On line are discussed in detail and reflected upon as case studies Costing and Publications Information which evolved in a more organic way The impact of both areas is considered in terms of benefits and detriments to research endeavour A mixed methods study of the perceived effects of ERA systems across the UK on the quality and quantity of research undertaken is also conducted This report presents the results of the Sunderland case studies which are complemented by the analysis of a series of national questionnaires looking at the perceptions of research managers and administrators and academic staff regarding ERA systems From the evidence presented it is shown that both RMA and ERA are perceived to have a positive impact on both the quality and quantity of research undertaken Furthermore the evidence base for the value of research management and administration as a profession is advanced not only for individual RMAs but also to the research community as a whole
