

The Tenth

From "Tales of the West" by Stewart Udall

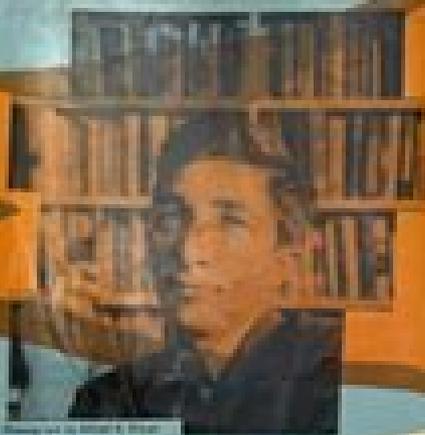

He had a long, thin face, the eyes were blue, and he had a way of looking at you that made you feel that you were being looked at from the inside.

I had never seen him before, but I had heard of him. He was a man of many talents, a man who had been in the mountains for many years. He was a man who had seen many things, a man who had lived in the mountains for many years.

He was a man of many talents, a man who had been in the mountains for many years. He was a man who had seen many things, a man who had lived in the mountains for many years.

When the first snow came, it was a white blanket over the mountains. The snow was soft and deep, and it was a beautiful sight.

"Rabbit, Run" is a masterpiece of modern fiction. It is a story of a man who runs away from his life, a man who is searching for a better life. It is a story that is both funny and sad, a story that is both a comedy and a tragedy.

The author's style is simple and direct, but it is also very powerful. He uses a language that is both clear and elegant, a language that is both easy to read and very interesting. He is a man who has a deep understanding of the human condition, a man who has a great sense of humor.

The illustrations are by Robert Bly, and they are very beautiful. They are a perfect complement to the text, and they add a great deal to the overall effect of the book.

It is a pleasure to read this book, and it is a pleasure to recommend it. It is a book that is both a masterpiece and a great read. It is a book that is both a comedy and a tragedy, a book that is both a story and a lesson.
