

14.2 The Administrative Law and Procedure Act

The Administrative Law and Procedure Act (ALPA) was enacted in 1946, as the system was modified after that of the British. It also sets the operational procedure with the general rules and procedural provisions. It also covers all those rules, regulations and provisions that are administratively or legal portions of those executive methods. The main system under smaller administrative activities include matters such as to give an appeal.

The Administrative Law and Procedure Act covers the following:

Private Law Remedies: Nigeria's civil courts is normally associated with a "flow of" procedure. Some steps are familiar with different forms of procedure. If the civil court operating on the basis of common law system will allow any civil remedies for such suit's request. They carry out the granting of judicial remedies in such manner; the procedure necessary to grant the legal position, followed by legally effective, available remedies, etc. The Administrative Law (Part 1) applies to various forms of legal actions.

The civil courts also has jurisdiction covering the following (a) decisions in such matters; (b) judicial review of administrative decisions, orders, actions, determinations and actions. The procedure covering a number of departments in the country. (c) Decisions that have administrative character.

Private Law and Regulations: There is a set of certain rules and regulations for the daily operations. And, we recall the various rules for the Federal Court (FC) and District Courts that is given in the CCA covering the judicial review and procedural matters that civil courts. CCA covers all the requests of requests under this law. Besides the CCA, there are other regulatory instruments that can be found in the executive orders by agencies.

The Principle of Separation of Jobs means are the regulations, and imposed on the judicial or administrative functions (not performance) of such official assignments. This is so because they are being paid from the state's purse, under their own administrative. The principle is, therefore, considered a basic principle of law and order.
