

1. What are variables? Why are they used in research?
A variable is a characteristic or attribute that can vary or change. Variables are used in research to measure and describe the phenomena being studied.
2. What are the different types of variables? Give examples of each.
Variables can be classified into three main types: qualitative, quantitative, and mixed. Qualitative variables are categorical and cannot be measured numerically. Quantitative variables are numerical and can be measured. Mixed variables are a combination of qualitative and quantitative variables.
3. What are the different levels of measurement? Give examples of each.
The four levels of measurement are nominal, ordinal, interval, and ratio. Nominal variables are categorical and cannot be ordered. Ordinal variables are categorical and can be ordered. Interval variables are numerical and have equal intervals between values. Ratio variables are numerical and have a true zero point.
4. What is a scale? What are the different types of scales? Give examples of each.
A scale is a set of items or questions that are used to measure a specific construct. There are four main types of scales: nominal, ordinal, interval, and ratio. Each type of scale has its own set of characteristics and uses.
5. How are variables measured? What are the different methods of measurement? Give examples of each.
Variables can be measured using a variety of methods, including self-report, observation, and physiological measurement. Each method has its own strengths and weaknesses.
6. What are the different types of measurement error? Give examples of each.
Measurement error can be classified into two main types: random error and systematic error. Random error is caused by unpredictable factors, while systematic error is caused by consistent factors.
7. Why are global variables used in research? Give examples of each.
Global variables are used in research to measure a specific construct across a large number of individuals or groups. They are often used in large-scale surveys and experiments.
